LIBER SECUNDUS;

LATINARUM ſcilicet NOTATIONES

Variaſque SIGNIFICATIONES

Juſto ordine tradens,

Allatiſque EXEMPLIS è claſſicis ſcriptoribus

Singulas confirmans.

A a, Roman, A a, Italian, both of moſt general uſe in writing the European languages; A a, Engliſh Saxon; 𝔄 𝔞, Engliſh black letter, nearly, as all the reſt, reſembling that of the German alphabet; Α α, Greek, called alpha, from the Hebrew א aleph, which, as all the letters in the Hebrew tongue are ſignificant, denotes either an ox, or a leader, marks of excellence and priority. The firſt place is deſervedly given to this letter on account of its ſimplicity, being little more than an opening of the mouth; * and its ſound, as a vowel (for it is properly a radical conſonant, as well as all the reſt) is determined by the adjunct vowel, if it have any, if not, it is ſilent, and hath no ſound. From this uſe of the Hebrews, the later Greeks ſeem to have taken their note of an eaſy breathing, which they prefixed to all words begining with a ſlender ſound, as in ἀπὸ, ἐπὶ, &c. to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe which begin with an aſpirate; as in ἅμα, ἑνάς. This was done after they had diveſted the eighth letter H of the conſonant power which it held in their ancient alphabet conformably to the Hebrew, to make uſe of its figure in denoting the long power of the vowel E. But the Latins followed them not herein, having formed their language from the ancient Æolians and Ionians, who had only the Cadmean alphabet of ſixteen letters. But to proceed, the Latin and the Engliſh A hath the ſame power and figure as the Greek; but its name, as well as the reſt of the letters, from the ſimple ſound a, bé, cé, &c. In Engliſh we have a threefold ſound of this vowel; ſhort, as in bat, cat, &c. like the Hebrew pathahh; long, as in dâte, fâte, &c. mixed with o, obſcure, as in call, fall, where we hear the ſame ſound as in olive, hollow, only that in the former it is long, conformably to the Hebrew ָ kametz, but in the latter ſhort, conformably to ֳ chateph kametz. It is greatly to be wiſhed that we had more letters expreſſive of vocal ſounds; or marks to thoſe we have, to aſcertain their power in the ſame ſyllable; as in fallow, falling; or in thoſe which are analogous, as in coſt, moſt, &c. The want of theſe equally affects our Latin pronunciation; for we pronounce mālus and mălus, păter and māter with the ſame ſound, which we can ſcarcely think the Latins did. We are indeed more ſecure in the Greek tongue, becauſe directed by more vowels, and the uſe of accents †. But to return, A, before e, and u, in the ſame ſyllable, make two dipthongs, æ, and au, the former of which in Latin is ſubſtituted both for αι the proper, and ᾳ the improper diphthong of the Greeks, as in Αἰνείας, Æneas, τῇ σφαίρᾳ, ſpheræ; and, on the con-

* The letters are not claſſed according to their natural ſounds; for then the vowels would have taken place of the conſonants, and E, not A, would have been firſt; for in the times of its occurrence, E, in all languages greatly exceeds all other letters, and conſequently muſt be the moſt natural note in the human voice.

In the diſpoſition of the letters no regard is ſhewn to proportion, or to any grammatical diſtribution, as into radical and ſervile, liquids, labials, &c. and therefore it is to be preſumed, that they are placed in the ſame order in which they were invented; for it is moſt probable they were not diſcovered at once.

The Greeks borrowed at firſt a few characters from the Phœnicians, and when they added others to them, they placed them in ſuch order as correſponded with the Phœnician alphabet; but this is no reaſon why the characters in the original alphabet ſhould not be placed in the order in which they were invented. Gr. Sharpe On the Origin and Structure of the Greek Tongue.

† Concerning the introduction, uſe, and accidental abuſe of the Greek accentual marks; I cannot but refer the reader to a late moſt excellent Eſſay on Accent and Quantity, (by Dr. Foſter,) cap. vi.

trary, the ancient Latins in their own words, when they had occasion to divide their æ, changed it into the Greek αι; as in aulaï, pictaï, frugiferaï. Some make ai a Latin diphthong, as in aio, Caius; but in ais, and ait, i manifestly belongs to the latter syllable, and the Greeks write not Γαῖος, but Γάιος; whence it seems to be very manifest that ai in the Latin tongue is not a diphthong, as in the Greek. As there is a mutual intercourse between all the vowels with each other, so in this a is changed into e; as in lacto, delecto, ago, egi; e into a, as in decem, decanus, aveo, avarus; a into i, as in apiscor, adipiscor; i into a, as reipsa, reapse; a into o, as in Sparta, Sportum, taxus, toxicum; o into a, as in foveo, favilla, volvo, valvæ, a into u, as in camera, cumera, taberna, contubernium; and u into a, as in glubo, glaber, μυδάω, madeo. In the Roman comitia, or assemblies for the making of laws, the people had two tables: in the one were two letters, U. R. uti rogas, signifying their assent; because a motion for a new law was called rogatio: in the other this letter A. i. e. antiquo, or antiquo probo, to shew their dissent. In capital causes they had also two tables covered with wax, in one of which was this letter A. i. e. absolvo; in the other C. for condemno; whence the former is by Tully, pro Milone, called salutaris, the latter tristis. In numerals it denoted anciently 500, and Ā 5000 *. Other uses of this, and the rest of the letters, in the compendious notes of the ancients, are too many to be enumerated here; I have therefore under this, as well as the following letters, explained those which most frequently occur, referring the explanation of the rest to a more general collection thereof out of Sertorius Ursatus, and others, which may be of use, sometimes, even to the learned themselves, in reading ancient inscriptions found upon Roman monuments and coins.

* The names, the place, or order, and the numeral power, of letters, are the same in Hebrew, Samaritan, Syriac, and Greek.—The last they owe to their place, and not their place to them; for the alphabetic characters must have been first known before they could have been applied to the purposes of arithmetic. Gr. Sharpe, ib. p. 141.

A, a;

A, a, Lat. ab A, a Græc. Nam formas literarum veteres Græcas penè eaſdem fuiſſe, quæ ſuo tempore fuerunt Latinæ, teſtatur Plinius 7, 58. Hanc vocalem ut inſuaviſſimam notat Cicero in Orat. 49, quod tamen de crebrâ ejus repetitione accipiendum; nam in eâ ſæpius iteratâ aſperitatem notavit etiam Martianus Capella. Sæpe quidem in alias atque alias vocales mutatur, tam longas, quàm correptas, aliquando fortè ſuavioris ſoni causâ; ſed cùm hoc commune habeat cum reliquis vocalibus, imò & conſonis, nihil hinc à primæ literæ dignitate abſcedere videtur.

Bb. The second letter, but first consonant in the alphabet, is a labial, and pronounced by shutting the lips, which A had opened. Among the mutes it hath a middle place and power, between the smooth and easy sound of P, and the aspirate and rougher sound of Ph, F, and V, every one of which in the derivation and inflection of words, is frequently, for the better sound, changed into some of the other; so from βοσκω comes pasco, from ἀπὸ ab, from labor, lapsus; from scribo, scripsi: thus b, always continuing in the inflection of such words before a vowel; but, because it would otherwise be too hard, before a consonant it is softened into p: thus from nubo comes nupsi; from θρίαμβος, triumphus; from φάλαινα, balæna; from βρέμω, fremo; from γιλβὸς, gilvus; from אב, avus. Yea, in some Latin words, b and v are indifferently written, as sebum and sevum; so also b and p; as Publicola and Poplicola; and b and f, as bubalus and bufalus. B is sometimes inserted in the middle of words for the better sound, as in ambages, ambio, amburo, &c. is servile in the inflection of the dative and ablative plural of the third, fourth, and fifth declensions of the Latin nouns; as likewise in those of the preterimperfect and future tenses; as also in the first and second conjugations.

C. c. The third letter, but second consonant, may indeed be copied immediately from the Hebrew כ, being exactly the same, only in complaisance to our way of writing, turning towards the right: yet is much more probably framed from the Greek Γ, its right and perpendicular line, for the more ease and quick dispatch in writing, instead of an angle, degenerating into a semicircle. For it is evident, that the Latin letters are many of them exactly the same with the Greek; and most of the rest, which are common to both tongues, differ no more, than haste, conveniency of writing, or, perhaps, some novel, and growing depravation might probably occasion. And I may add also, That many words natives of Greece, were made denizens of Rome, without any formality of changing their garb, especially those of Dorick families: others again, in pretty near proportion between their number of words and letters, suffer some change, to be more civilly treated there: besides, it is notorious that the Roman youth were anciently taught both to read, and write their own language by Greek masters. This I judge proper to observe here once for all, and proceed. The rank which C holds in the Latin alphabet, answering that of Γ in the Greek, is a farther evidence of this extraction: besides, when the Greeks in their own letters express a pure Latin word, where this letter is found, they commonly substitute Γ, or K, for Cajus Cæsar, writing Γαῖος Καῖσαρ. Yea, in many Latin words c and g are indifferently written; as Cajus Cnæus, or Gajus Gnæus. But before I go farther, I must do a piece of justice to this letter, by declaring, that though it acknowledge the Greek Γ for its parent, yet it may challenge the same regard from the Latin letters g and k, and, in the opinion of some learned men, from q also: the first whereof was not known to the Romans, till after the first Punick war. This is plainly proved from the royal laws, where Acnom is writ for Agnum, Acrom for Agrum; and that famous remaining piece of antiquity, the monumental pillar of Duilius, where we read Lecio pucnandod, exfocont, &c. for Legio pugnando, effugiunt. As for K, it appears never to have been much used, and is now so obsolete, that it is not written in more than two or three Latin words, where c is always indifferently, or perhaps better, used. And for Q, the indifferency found in writing very many Latin words therewith, or with C, as cur, or quur; cum, or quum; locutus, or loquutus, cottidie, or quotidie, hath induced many Criticks to deduce its original from c. But this shall be considered in its proper place. The name of C, if we attend to analogy, is always Kè, as is its sound before all vowels; and never Sè. And here, with much reluctance, I remark, That foreigners, who own we understand Latin perfectly, and write it correctly, account us little better than barbarians, in several parts of pronunciation; but in none more justly, than our depraved sound of this letter before æ, œ, e, i, and y, as if it were S; which at the same time our learned men confess to differ from the ancient usage of Greece, and Rome, to be unreasonable in itself, and to introduce duce a ſtrange confuſion in words and things; ſo that cædo, and ſedo; cæpi, and ſepi; cenſus, and ſenſus; cicer, and ſiſer; cygni, and ſigni, and many thouſands more, have with us, one and the ſame ſound. Hence alſo it comes to paſs, that its ſound is entirely loſt after ſ; ſo that cœna, and ſcena; celeris, and ſceleris, and innumerable words of the ſame kind, are confounded. This I humbly leave to the conſideration and redreſs of the learned ſchool-maſters of this kingdom, as very well deſerving it, and return to its true ſound; which is the ſame with that uſurped by the exploded K, and ſtands related to the harder ſound of g, as p to b; and therefore in the inflection of words g before a vowel, is changed into c before a conſonant; as ago, actum, not agtum; lego, lectum, not legtum; juſt as ſcribo, ſcriptum. Neither ought it to be ſounded with an aſpirate, as the modern Italians do, who ſay chichindela, Chichero, &c. for cicindela, Cicero. Concerning its intercourſe with ſ, and t, the tenuis of the third Claſs of Mutes, I rather chooſe to treat in the diſſertation upon thoſe letters, leſt I ſhould be thought too tedious in this. A.

Censor, ōris, m. verb. [à censeo] qui agebat censum tam de personis, quam rebus, sic enim vett. Gloss. Censor ἀπογραφεύς, ἐξετάστης, τιμητής. (1) He who executed the Census, which was first instituted by Servius Tullius, and managed as a part of his kingly office. In the consular state, the consuls themselves executed it, as a part of their business, till the year of the city 311. when, by reason of the too great employment they had on their hands, the senate were willing, for divers political reasons, to ease them of this part of their burden, by creating two of these officers, Papirius and Sempronius; whose office being at that time only to take an account of the number of the people, and the value of their estates, and to assess them accordingly, it was looked upon as mean; but afterwards the succeeding censors, on the accession of more business, acquired so great authority, that even the emperors themselves exercised the office. They were to censure, and punish evil, and indecent manners, such as the law took no cognizance of, by degrading the senators, and knights, and disfranchising the commonalty. They had the care of publick buildings bridges, and ways, as also of the making, and abrogating, certain laws, &c. (2) Met. It is also taken for a censurer, critick, or other severe person. (1) Cum tabulis animum censoris sumet honesti Hor. Ep. 2, 109. Mart. 12, 71, 4. * Cōmœdia, æ. f. [à κώμη, vicus, & ᾠδὴ, cantus, quòd initio in vicis juvenes cantare ſoliti eſſent, antequam in urbes conveniſſent Feſt.] A comedy, or interlude. See the commendation, uſe, and end of it, in Donatus's preface to Terence; its definition in Scal Poët. 1, 5. It is either old, or new. The old, whereof Eupolis, Cratinus, and Ariſtophanes were maſters, is deſcribed by Quint. 10, 1. and the exceſs of liberty, its greateſt fault, by Cic. 4. De Repub. Quo genere jocandi, eleganti, urbano, ingenioſo, faceto, Plautus noſter, & antiqua comœdia referta eſt, Id. Off. 1, 104. Menander, Poſidippus, Diphilus, Apollodorus, were the principal authors of the new; which differed from the old almoſt in every thing; in matter, manner, time, furniture, ſtyle, and verſe. Their matter was almoſt as copious as that of Satyre; every action and perſon, even the greateſt commanders and princes not being excepted, and herein more blame-worthy, becauſe it reflected on the good as well as bad. See Cicero in the place quoted. The new fetched its arguments from common life, as it did alſo its perſons, who were generally young gentlemen in love, and their ſervants tricking their old maſters, to gratify their young ones. The old flouriſhed about the time of the Peloponneſian war; the new when Greece had loſt its liberty. The furniture of the old was very large, of the new very ſmall; the Chorus being entirely taken away. The ſtyle of the old was epick, or ſatyrical; of the new, mean, or low. The old admitted all kinds of verſe; the new, the iambick only. The neceſſary parts of both are four, viz. the Protaſis, the Epitaſis, the Cataſtaſis, and the Cataſtrophe; which ſee in their places.

D, The fourth Roman letter, is almost of the same figure with that in the celebrated Βυςροφηδὸν inscription, which was brought into Britain by William Sherrard, doctor of laws, a gentleman eminent for his knowledge in many parts of curious learning; who, being consul at Smyrna, ordered it with the utmost care and diligence to be copied from a huge stone lying still at Sigeum, where the literature 2300 years ago (which was before the use of the long vowels and double consonants had obtained) shows itself not only to the wonder and admiration of the curious, but also to the great benefit and advantage of students, and critics in the Greek tongue; especially as illustrated by the reverend and learned divine and antiquary Mr. Chishull. In this monument the angles, which are unequal, thus Δ, come nearer the form of the Roman than the modern Δ, whose angles are equal, and therefore more easily slip into the form of an Italian D, by leaving the left angle as it was, and circumflecting the two others, for the greater haste in writing; which was done soon after, as we plainly see in the noble inscription of Herodes Atticus, that learned critic and antiquary, which was graven on his pillars, exactly both in letters and spelling, after the pattern of remote ages; vid. Gruter. Inscript. p. 27. Nor is it a wonder that the Latin letters are the same with the Greek, since Latium itself was anciently called Græcia Major. Thus much I thought fit to premise with respect to the form of the letter. As to its name, this, as well as all the other letters, the Romans seem to have called by the Greek names of Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, &c. Whence Juvenal, Hoc discunt omnes, ante Alpha & Beta, puellæ. Sat. 14. 209.

Thus also Cicero calls his country-seat at Formiæ, Digamma, because it begins with the Æolian F.

With respect to the power of this letter, it hath a middle sound between t and th; and therefore hath its place in the middle of the last rank of the mutes, being a t hardened, as t is a d softened; and both of them, as well as those of the other ranks, frequently changed into each other: for example, from μῦδος comes mutus; from ἀκίδος, the genitive of ἀκὶς, sagitta; from ἄθης, ador; from πέρθω, perdo; from γαθέω, gaudeo. Neither doth our English tongue refuse this change, at coming from ad; what from quid; two from duo; three, and thrust, from tres, trudo; and water from ὕδωρ. It also admits of a substitute out of the second rank of its sisters, to soften its sound, as quicquid, quicquam, quicque, for quidquid, &c. Neither doth this letter refuse an intercourse with three of the liquids, viz. l, n, r. To omit Greek words, wherein their mutual offices are most obvious, as less instructive to the younger sort, for whose service these notes upon literature, in the proper sense of the word, are principally designed; the ancients said dingua, sedda, for lingua, sella; cadamitas for calamitas; dispennere for dispendere; arventus for adventus; and this letter still keeps its post in arbiter and arcessio. It also corresponds with the solitary s, as Ῥόδον, rosa. It admits before it in the same, or diverse syllables of the mutes, b; as βδέω, pedo, bdellium, abdico; and g, but not in the same syllable, as, ὀγδόος, smaragdus: of the liquids, l, n, r, in diverse syllables, as calda, candor, cardo: and in the Latin tertius, and the English Third, you have all the three of the last rank exemplified. In the preposition ad, d may keep its place almost before any consonant, or be changed into the consonant of the beginning word, except b, v, and j; as adcurrro, or accurro, &c. but the change is more usual in many words, to make the pronunciation softer, or quicker; for we seldom write adcommodo, adcuso, &c. in these cases indeed use is the best rule. This letter was also anciently used to prevent the collision of two vowels in different words, as Censes med esse? for me esse, Plaut. which use it still retains in the same word; as, prodes, proderam, prodire, for proes, proeram, proire. Yea, in the most ancient times, it was added to the preceding word even before consonants, as it should seem to make the sound more masculine, for instance in the Duilian or Bilian pillar, where we read In altod marid pucnandod, for In alto mari pugnando. Lastly, in numerals D stands for 500; being not a letter, but rather used for a numeral mark, as the Greeks use ϛ for 6, and the Hebrews ל for 90: for the numeral note of 1000 being CIↃ, from the old ↀ, one half thereof is IↃ; which, for the more speedy writing, being drawn close together, makes D.
